Mexican - U.S. Relations

Our speaker on October 25 is Alicia Kerber, who heads the Mexican Consulate in Philadelphia. She will discuss the current state of diplomatic relations between her country and the United States.

Her appearance comes amid growing tensions between Mexico and the U.S. over trade and border security. President Trump has imposed stiffer trade restrictions and has advocated construction of a wall along the border to keep out illegal immigrants.

Last May, 80 FPA members visited the Mexican Embassy in Washington, DC.

The Mexican Consulate in Philadelphia is responsible for protecting the interests of Mexicans living, working or traveling throughout Pennsylvania, Delaware and South Jersey. The office also facilitates economic, educational and cultural exchanges. Prior to her current assignment, Ms. Kerber held a similar position in Kansas City.

She has represented Mexico as officer for political affairs at the Mexican Embassy in Colombia; consul of Mexico in San Pedro Sula, Honduras; and deputy representative of Mexico before the Organization of American States in Washington. She also served for two years as deputy head of mission at the Mexican Embassy in Ireland.

Born in Mexico City, Ms. Kerber has worked in the Mexican foreign service since 1991, completing assignments in the areas of environment, natural resources and human rights. She holds a doctorate degree in international law from the National Autonomous University of Mexico. She has written several articles and essays for academic journals, both in Mexico and elsewhere, on subjects related to international organizations regional security, and human rights.

Globalism vs. Nationalism

Scribed by Kylee Petritsch
Lebanon Valley College

Orfeo Fioretos, who teaches international relations and economics at Temple University, says globalization and nationalism are not polar opposites, as some might suggest, but acknowledged that there long has been tension between the two.

Fioretos addressed the Foreign Policy Association on September 27 just two days after President Trump, in a speech before the United Nations, declared that the United States rejects the ideology of globalism and accepts the ideology of patriotism.

Fioretos said there was nothing unusual about a country giving priority to its own national interests, but that as a world power, the U.S. needs to remain actively engaged in international affairs.

He emphasized four points:

- There is nothing new about the struggle between globalization and nationalism.
- Anti-globalism divides political conservatives.
- Extreme nationalism often inhibits a country's international relations.
- Nationalism is a poor platform in the long term and tends to undermine some of America's greatest accomplishments on the world stage.

Fioretos described internationalism as the glue that holds the world together and paved the way toward peace and prosperity.

He said that while the tension is real between globalization and nationalism, this tension is heightened by political leaders who blame globalization for standing in the way of their domestic agendas.

He said globalization remains a weak force in today's world, that the U.S. and other nations continue to put their own interests ahead of international cooperation.

Fioretos is a former president of the International History and Politics Section of the American Political Science Association. He holds a doctorate degree from Columbia University.
